

My wife and I have been extremely happy since Indiana instituted its telephone privacy law. This law has noticeably enhanced the quality of our evenings and weekends. We routinely were called 3-4 times per night from companies.

In my work I am on call and need to answer every call to be sure it is not work-related. We have a right to privacy if we so choose that should take precedence over any business's right to market to us.

Colleagues at work have all noticed the lack of annoying calls at their home. It would be a mistake to weaken Indiana's law in this area from a practical or political standpoint.
